The easygoing audience rolled in chatting, happy, expectant. Ben the Sound, one of Hamilton's best audio techs, gave me directions for best listening spot, and accompanist extraordinaire, David Sidwell, decided to play bare footed so that he would have a more sensitive control of the soft pedal on the mercifully real piano.

Ruby had been delayed, filming on Shortland Street, so Sam Rickett, with guitar and technowiz one man band kit performed.

Most of the audience loved it. A couple of old codgers didn't, and talked. Loudly.

Others followed, or played lone Facebook. Bad form, chaps.

Then Mr Sidwell flexed his flexible fingers, and sat, poised ... and the double act arrived on stage. Ms Gwen Lyon sang an opening song about selfconsciousness and fear of mistakes on a first date.

It could have been schmaltzy and trite, but Ms G. disappeared straight into the vulnerable character and turned the song into a movingly beautiful portrait of human fallibility.

Then came an apparently innocuous duet which turned into a vocal duel inspired by their dislike of each other, and we had the wonderful paradox of violent animosity delivered in exquisite harmony, unimaginable dynamics, and spellbinding rhythms.

Over The Rainbow took mezzo Ruby through a solo where the lower register was velvety and rich, and the upper voice as clear and pure as the rainbow she was delivering, and it hit the audience that this was not merely a couple of local girls earning a buck busking at a festival. Here were two remarkable voices, each enhancing the other, disciplined and sensitive at the same time, delivering songs of love and separation, of loss and redemption, and of reality and wishful thinking, and winning every time. Even the crusty critic, found himself not quite able to see to write as his eyes moistened during Gwen's poignant realising of barricades and bravery in her song from Les Miserables. Every festival has its gems. This was one for 2017.
